New national Child Protection Authority announced

In December, the Department for Education (DfE) announced that it had plans to create a new Child Protection Authority as part of government strategy to protect children from predators and abuse.

The new Child Protection Agency will be tasked with identifying emerging threats and driving accountability across the system. This new public body will provide national oversight, ensuring that vulnerable children are not failed by the authorities who are supposed to protect them.

It comes alongside a broad package of measures being introduced through the Children's Wellbeing and Schools Bill, which will ensure that agencies responsible for looking after children are working together closely and sharing relevant information, to get frontline expertise to where it's needed and ensure no child falls through the cracks.

It also sits alongside the Independent Inquiry into Grooming Gangs announced by the Home Secretary in mid-December. Chaired by Baroness Anne Longfield, the inquiry will examine the actions of the police, councils, social services and other agencies, both locally and nationally, making sure any wrongdoing or cover-ups are brought to light and holding those responsible to account - backed by £65 million of funding.
